Market Recap

The global technology sector generated strong returns, outpacing broader equities. While aggressive monetary and fiscal action were welcomed, some technology stocks also benefited from the acceleration of secular themes associated with their products. Nearly all subsectors within the fund's benchmark generated positive returns, with semiconductor equipment and software names among important contributors.

For June, the fund outperformed its benchmark, the MSCI All Country World Information Technology Index. Many of the secular themes that we believe will drive tech earnings growth in coming years accelerated as businesses and households altered behaviours to navigate a COVID-19 world.

Perhaps no other company registered an increase in demand for its products more than Amazon, one of the month's top contributors. Ecommerce went mainstream as households sheltered in place and slow adopters of online shopping became reliant on the convenience of digital purchases. Similarly, the company's cloud business, AWS, proved to be a valuable tool for companies seeking to increase both their front-office and back-office capabilities as customers and employees adapted to working remotely.

Online automobile seller Vroom was another monthly contributor which can be seen as a beneficiary of the disruption in consumption patterns caused by sheltering in place. The company seeks to redefine the car buying experience and the virtues of its business model were discovered by a large pool of potential customers over the past few months.

Another recent driver of technology gains was a surge in industry heavyweight Apple. Given the large share of the index it commands, we maintain an underweight position in the stock. This can detract from relative fund returns when the stock outperforms, as was the case this month. We increased our position in Apple given the company's transition to a model geared more on services and wearables, along with the rollout of 5G and an elongated replacement cycle given pandemic-related delays. Furthermore, its management has been repositioning the company as a luxury brand with an ecosystem exposed to essential functions like payments and health.

Another detractor was Alibaba. The Chinese ecommerce provider has recently been unable to keep up with peers in an aggressive market. The company is undergoing a significant investment cycle but so far few of its potential new endeavours appear to have convinced shareholders that these investments will result in lucrative new products or markets. The company also lost share to upstart ecommerce companies and has little to no presence in gaming or food delivery, while there is always the possibility Alibaba could continually be called upon to conduct national service in the wake of the pandemic - where history tells us that such requests can diminish the economic benefits to shareholders. We are eager to see how its management addresses these issues and positions the company for its next growth phase.

Outlook

The technology sector finds itself in a unique position as the global economy continues to navigate – and hopefully emerge from – the COVID-19 pandemic. The recent broad equities rally indicates that investors believe economic growth is close to finding sound footing. Should that be the case, we would expect more economically sensitive segments of technology to perform well.

Among these are semiconductors, digital advertising and payments. The latter category is of note as we would expect it to behave more like software than semiconductors. But while we believe digital payments are a durable, secular theme, these businesses were not constructed to withstand a shutdown of the global economy. While this has resulted in payment stocks lagging, we believe these business models could be well positioned to participate in an increasingly digital economy.

Should an economic recovery remain elusive, however, we would expect other secular growth themes to remain favoured investment destinations. Among these are ecommerce, the cloud, the Internet of Things and artificial intelligence.

Janus Henderson Global Technology and Innovation Fund

We remain mindful of valuations in certain technology segments. While we believe that the market still underestimates the duration of some of our favoured growth themes, we recognise market forces can push valuations beyond what is justified by underlying fundamentals. Conversely, although we believe deep discounts in technology valuations often mean value traps, we continue to seek attractive business models potentially overlooked by the market.
